Sondre

On a completely ordinary Thursday night, the police arrive with a terrible message. Sondre is dead. He was hit by a train after walking into the underground, wearing a black suit and a white shirt. The police quickly decide that this is an ordinary case of an apparently successful young man who has committed suicide. After the initial shock, Sondre's mother is tormented by doubt. Is it even possible, that her lively, bright and strong-willed boy could have killed himself? In her desperate search for answers, she meets a wall of secrecy, lies and deception. Undeterred, she continues to investigate the circumstances surrounding Sondre's sudden death, determined to find out what exactly happened to her son.

There is dark mystery surrounding the young man's tragic death, but what drives the story even more intensely is the way it portrays the mother's desperate struggle for the truth. A chilling, but deeply moving authenticity screams quietly out of the pages of this book.
